The hormonal regulation of pituitary adenylate cyclase-activating polypeptide (PACAP)-induced K⁺ currents in anterior pituitary lactotrophs was studied. These currents were investigated by using the whole-cell patch clamp technique in lactotrophs acutely isolated from pituitary glands of estrogen-primed female Wistar-Imamichi rats. These cells were identified by their shape and growth characteristics. PACAP induced a depolarization that was associated with a time-dependent increase in the amplitude of a K⁺ current. The current voltage relationship indicates the presence of two types of K⁺ currents induced by PACAP. The activation of the K⁺ currents was achieved by the application of the neuropeptide PACAP6-38 at the bath side. The size of the inward currents was significantly reduced by 4-aminopyridine (4-AP). Currents could not be detected when recordings were obtained in pipette solution with reduced K⁺ conductivity (EGTA/HEPES). In high Cl⁻ pipette solution, PACAP could induce a current that did not show the time-dependent or voltage-dependent properties of a K⁺ current and did not reverse direction during a pulse. The activation of the K⁺ currents was not prevented by the conventional K⁺ channel blocker tetra
